

- Business Entity Formation

- Definition: the form of business a business owner uses to operate his or her company. It's a legal fiction created to assist and facilitate the ownership, management and transfer of businesses. Business entities may operate as legal persons owning assets and incurring liabilities and managing those assets. Business entities are separate and distanced legally from the business owners.

Business entities are formed at the state level throughout the United States. Thus, there is no local or federal impact here.

- Wisconsin Department of Financial Institutions

www.wdfi.org

The Wisconsin Department of Financial Institutions regulates the formation of all business entities in Wisconsin except sole proprietorships and general partnerships. These forms of business do not need to file with the state to begin doing business. However, there may be other regulatory issues such as business license, trademark or trade name issues that sole proprietors or general partnerships should consider, and this site can be a valuable resource. When using this site, click on the Corporate Services link to review the list of frequently asked questions. There's also a section that includes helpful forms.

- State of Wisconsin

www.wisconsin.gov

The State of Wisconsin home page is a very helpful resource. When there, click on Business Services, which leads to a link to business forms. This link defines all of the forms in Wisconsin and links back to the Wisconsin Department of Financial Institutions Web site, which includes information on how to complete them.

- US Small Business Administration (SBA)

How should you structure your business?

Which form of organization (sometimes referred to as "business entity") will be best for your business? Two key features to consider in structuring your business are liability protection and desired tax treatment. You should discuss the best business entity for your situation with an attorney or accountant.

There are several ways to form a business including: sole proprietorship, partnerships, corporations, limited liability companies, and limited liability partnerships. There is a great deal of information on the internet addressing business legal structures, such as the “small business: section on www.nolo.com.

When choosing a business entity, consider:

Liability Protection—your personal liability should be a major factor in determining what entity you should choose. Sole proprietorships and general partnerships offer no liability limits for their owner/partners (i.e., your personal assets are up for grabs). “High risk” industries often consider limited partnership, LLC, LLP, “S” or “C” Corporations.

Taxes—taxes are another major factor in choosing an appropriate business entity. There can be significant cost savings in picking one form over another, especially when it comes to self-employment and income taxes. But don’t forget payroll and estate taxes. You can save a great deal of money by having the right entity.

Management—your management structure will determine which entities you can or cannot have. If your business is owned by more than one individual, you cannot be a sole proprietor. In addition, if you wish to offer your key employees minority ownership, you’ll need to plan in advance and choose the entity that best accomplishes that.

Ownership Transition—in some cases you may need to change your company’s form of entity to accomplish a transition in ownership (perhaps you have a child coming into the business?) A thoroughly planned strategy can save you money.

Capitalization—at some point your business may need to raise capital from external sources to fund expansion and growth. Picking the right entity in this case will help you get the money you require.
